Not only has the railroad bill been passed—regarded by many as the greatest piece of constructive legislation drawn for many years—but one or the other branches of congress has already passed the budget bill, called by many the greatest stride towards economy of government and reform in twenty years. It has also returned to private owner-ship the telephone and telegraph lines, which the government controlled during the war; it has passed the land bill, thus settling trouble which has existed since the days of the Ballinger-Pinchet ontroversy; it has amended the war risk insurance act, and made better pro-visions for wounded soldiers through the vegational training acts — besides matters growing out of the war than right-new.

Mrs. Pierce was convinced that the company was blameless, because she looked upon the derailing of the train as an act of God. She was anxious not to be disturbed by a court decision that should run contrary to her consoling belief that a special Providence had taken away from the president-elect his only child in order that he might give himself wholly to the duties of his great office.

The cynical lawyer did not attempt to prove that the accident was due to a Suppernatural cause, but he so cleverly upset the technical evidence of its mechanical content that he cleared the corporation. Presidential honors never were less welcome in any home than in that of the Pierces. Washington was dreaded by Mrs. Pierce as a place of exile. When Benjamin, her little son, who was away at school, heard of the nomination, he sat down and wrote her that he hoped his father would be defeated in the election, seemingly having caught his mother's dislike of the capital and of public life.
